LETTER IV.

A T length the long predicted consequences and fatal effects of m——I misconduct, so much derided by those who gave and those who received the wages of iniquity, are become too alarming to be denied by the most hardy and inured to that pernicious practice.

Even those who traffic in your undoing, acquiesce in this truth, and presume to vindicate themselves by asferting ye were found undone, when the ad---n was delivered into their hands, and that no remedy has fufficient efficacy to save you from perdition.

The dire dilemma into which ye are brought, your distressed situation, the loads of accumulated taxes, the diminution of trade, the neglect of English welfare, the attention to Germanic interests, the reliances on foreign mercenaries, and contempt of British subjects for the defence of this island, the whole conduct of affairs, both at home and abroad, in Europe and America, and that despicable appearance to which ye are reduced in the fight of every nation upon earth, render this too visible to every eye the least inquisitive, and too afflicting to every heart not yet transformed to stone by the long practice of plundering its native land.  $T_{0}$

To avoid all appearance of inflammatory declamation, and silence the defamatory tongues of all who share their country's spoils, who affert that every attempt to emancipate you from your evils, is a malignant design to depreciate the m—y; let us impartially recall to your eyes the most material articles of the ad—n, since the commencement of differences between the British and French subjects on the banks of the river Obio.

In this place, the more effectually to lay before you the real causes of this war, it will be necessary to lead you back to a transaction not sufficiently known by all of you, which passed between the m-y of France and England.

In the year 1750, or 1751, some American traders, subjects of the king of Great Britain, travelled to the borders of the Obio, to traffic with the natives of those parts. This being known to the Canadian French, mesfengers were dispatched to acquaint them, that unless they withdrew from their master's territories, their effects would be confiscated, and themselves carried to prison at Quebec. This message the traders thought fit to obey, and withdrew in confequence of it.

The fucceeding feafon, another company of Britists subjects came to trade on the Obio, and not withdrawing on a like message with the former, their goods were confiscated, and themselves carried prisoners to Quebec, from whence they were brought to Rochelle in France, and fill detained in prison. Not conscious of having violated the laws of nations, or traded on any ground to which the king of Great Britain had not an undoubted nourably discharged from prison, as persons unoffending the laws of nations; nay, they entertained the honourable hopes of Englishmen, that the m—y of E—d would not cease to demand an indemnisication for the loss of that merchandize which had been unjustly taken from them, and reparation for the infult and long imprisonment of their persons; expectations becoming men who value their liberties, properties, and nation's ho( 3 )

nour. In this they were deceived: the true spirit of an  $En-\int bm-r$  no longer dwelt amongst us; the amb-r at Paris, instead of demanding these subjects of his master, as men unjustly held in prison, and reparation for the injuries they had received, was ordered by the m-y to sollicit, as a favour from the court of France, the discharge of them only, acknowledging their offence. Were not your some privileges shamefully given up? Were not the lands on the Obio confessed to belong to the king of France? Were not the French justified in imprisoning your fellow subjects, and confiscating their effects, by this tame behaviour of the  $B-\int bm-r$ ?

After this dastardly concession in those whose duty it is to defend your privileges, can it be a wonder, that that country was claimed by the French as their own, or that they began to build forts and block-houses to secure the trade, and ascertain the property of it?

Little as this transaction was known or attended to in E - d, the taking possession in this manner of the frontiers of Virginia, alarmed the people of that province; in consequence of which Mr. Washington attacked them in those parts, and was defeated.

It feems, however, that before this timid acquiescence of the B-/h m—r, in thus acknowledging that part of A—a to be the property of France, he had granted the lands on the Obio to a quaker of the city of London, and his associates.

Thus caught between the king of France and a quaker, like the mariners of old between Scylla and Charybdis, he became unequal to the dangers and difficulty of the steerage, and fell into great embarrassiments.

He now perceived, that though he had pufilanimously given up to enemies his matter's rights and your privileges, that the French minister, tenacious of both, and his own honour, could not be negociated into receding from what had been granted him: he perceived also, that the quaker, fortified by a pertinacious adherence to his own interest, could not be soothed into relinquishing the grant which had been made him. If the French

monarch was backed by the arm of flesh, and 200,000men to support his claim to the Obio, the quaker was sustained in his by the spirit of obstinacy, and interest of the legion of sectaries. On one side a French invasion and a war filled the m—r with horrid apprehensions; on the other, he was greatly disquieted, lest, by the deserting the quaker, he should offend the money-jobbers of the city, and be unable to raise the supplies.

To strengthen this dilemma of the m—r, there was added to the insuperable propensity in a quaker of never relinquishing an advantage, a secondary motive, which probably at that time escaped the sharp-sighted ken of our m—l Lynceus. The grant of the Obio, however great it might be conceived, was a distant and problematical advantage only; a war on the continent of America was a present and positive one, as the remittances to the armies in those parts, an object of great gain, would pass through his hands, and by means of this money sent to America, his debtors in that country would be enabled to discharge those debts, which otherwise he entertained but little hopes of receiving.

Urged by these motives, this son of meekness and resignation pressed the m—r to send those subjects, whose loyalty to their king, and love to their country, are above all sear of danger, to sacrifice their lives in recovering the lands of men whose principles will not permit them to defend the cause, or fight the battles of their king or country.

Thus, at first, the want of spirit in the m——r, to vindicate his s——n's rights and subjects privileges, timidly befeeching as a favour, what he had a right to demand in justice from the French, has given that nation a better foundation to the claim of the Obio.

If it be asked, whence it comes to pass, that this behaviour of the B--sh m--r has never been mentioned in the French memorials relative to the disputes in America, it may be answered, with truth, that the French ministry perfectly knew, that this ceding the territories of England, by the timidity of the m-r, was no legal relinquishing the B—-sh right to these lands, and that the K—g and people would never acquiesce in this concession.

They therefore made no public use of this argument, referving it only between the B-k m-r and themfelves, lest a public declaration of this affair might remove him from the ad--n, and the French monarch lose an ally of greater consequence to his success, than any potentate in Europe; for what can impart such strength to an enemy, as the want of courage and capacity in the man who opposes him?

The French m—y had proved in a former war, and by long experience in peace, the inconsistency, inability, and timidity of this man. To these they were greatly indebted for their success in the late war; on his dispositions and capacity they presumed to encroach upon us during peace; on the same qualities they promised themselves the like advantages for the future. To discover his timid and absurd behaviour was to risque his removal, an event to be dreaded by all French subjects. They concluded, perhaps too rashly, that as no nation ever had furnished two m-rs, succeeding each other, fo unequal to the task of governing as this man, that therefore no nation could; and in confequence of this manner of thinking, fecreted this behaviour with respect to the Obio, and chose rather to make Nova Scotia the object of the quarrel to the public. This they determined to sustain by arms, when they found themselve's defeated in argument.

After a most gracious speech from the throne at the beginning of the session, when all was gentle and pacific, on Tuesday the 25th of March 1755, the scene suddenly changes, war becomes the universal conversation, and a message was fent from his m y to both houses, importing that

(6) the present situation of affairs required an augmentation of his forces by sea and land, to defend his just rights in America, and repel whatever attempts might be made against his kingdoms; not doubting but his faithful p-t would enable him to make fuch augmentations as the emergency of affairs should require.

To this message both houses presented very loyal addresses, expressing their utmost zeal and affection for his majesty's royal person, family, and government, assuring him of a ready compliance in supporting him to repel all attempts which may be made to disturb, or deprive him of his kingdoms.

Let us now see what provision has been made in defence of all parts of his m—y's dominions by his m—r, in confequence of this resolution of hostilities. Mr Braddock had been just sent to Virginia with English forces; the fatal effects of that expedition, the weakness of the design, and inessectual execution of it, have already been been laid before you.

The defeat of that officer being accompanied with his death, a mistake, not inferior to the first choice of this commander, was discovered to every eye; it seems there was no officer amongst the remaining military force which had been fent to America, equal to a command of fuch con-

The m-r then, who planned this expedition, must have concluded that Mr Braddock was both invincible and immortal; otherwise, as a disease might defeat all the fuccess which the greatest courage, prudence, and capacity might atchieve, and the French arms prevail by the loss of a general whom death only could conquer, he would have fent a fecond, equal to the task of commanding an army. My reason for saying this, is, that when opportunity had proved, contrary to m--l wifdom, that this general was neither invincible nor immortal, the command did not devolve on any officer fent from hence with Mr. Braddock.

Now to me it feems, that nothing can be a more convincing proof of the m-r's imagining Mr Braddock superior to death and defeat, and of the supposed insuf-

ficiency of all the officers who accompanied him, than the command in chief falling on g-1 s-y.

This gentleman had been bred at the bar, and was grown old in the practice of it; by unforseen accidents he at last became g-r of a province in New England; he had never been present at siege or battle, and his talents, however nicely adapted to his profession of the law, and other departments of a g--r, promised but little success in the management of military affairs, being by nature flow, diffident, and inert. Him, notwithstanding, the  $E-\int b m$ —r selected to command the king's armies in America, accompanied with the appointments and pay of the late duke of Marlborough.

It is remarkable also, that the m--- choice falling on this gentleman, proved a more favourable circumstance to our enemies, than could have happened in the appointing of any other American governor. What a surprising genius for deviating from the right, is this nation blest with in a m-r!

The character of every other governor in America being unknown to the French court, whoever besides had been appointed g-l, they might probably have concluded, that as he ought to be, so he was, equal to the command of an army. This would, at least, have made our enemies less sanguine in their hopes of success; but Mr S—y was as well known at Paris, where he resid. ed a long while com-y for fettling Nova Scotia, as in London; so that the French ministry being perfectly acquainted with his talents, the apprehensions of danger from such a commander, were but little in their minds, or in those who were to oppose him.

Nay, so full were the Paristans, on the news of his being appointed commander in chief in America, that the first falutation amongst those who were acquainted with him was, Que pensez vous monsieur, le ministre d'Angleterre a nommé notre ami monsseur S-y general des armies du roy en Amerique.

Notwithstanding this appellation of friend by the French, I am convinced it did not arise from any prevailing inclination imagined in g-l S-y towards that nation; nor would I be thought to blame him for accepting this post, so honourable and lucrative; to have refused it, would have been an unexampled instance of felf-denial; an expectation not founded in the nature of man: nothing is more natural than to imagine ourselves equal to every undertaking which our superiors conceive us to be; without this prevalent and encouraging felf-opinion, the m—r must have long since resigned his charge.

In consequence of being destined to the chief command, Mr S-y repaired to Albany, where, after long imitating the celebrated Fabius in delay, he, at length, with the same deliberation, began his march, counting his steps, towards the Lake Ontario, where being, alas, too maturely arrived, and perceiving that nothing was to be done against the enemy, he as deliberately marched back again, meeting no opposition which he did not easily overcome: and thus began and ended the expedition of g_____, exactly as it had been predicted by all who knew him, imitating the great Lewis in going up the hill and coming down again. In this, however, the whole blame rests on him who chose, and not on him that was chosen; the g-l furely is to be pardoned who failed in his expedition, when the m-r was fo much mistaken in his judgment of him.

Notwithstanding this manifest deficiency in the B-/bm - -y, in the choice of their generals, that of the Americans was as remarkably just. General Johnson, formed by nature for the military art, whom fagacity blended with courage, activity with patience, rendered what is not always to be found amongst seen-service and regular bred warriors, was the object of their choice.

This gentleman, with the militia of the provinces, took the French general prisoner, and defeated ten times the number of those French troops, before which Mr Bra. dock and his regulars shamefully retired; and though this military success was followed by no farther advantage to the American cause than that of taking prisoner the enemy's general, it must be imputed entirely to the jarring councils of the different provinces, delay in fending provisions and recruits, envy of his fuccess, and various other causes.

Let us now turn our eyes on what was transacted in another part of America. It feems the inhabitants of New England, being thoroughly acquainted with the importance of Nova Scotia, had resolved to drive the French from their forts in that part of America. With this view general Winslow and 2000 militia sailed for Halijax, where being arrived, and joined by about 2 or 300 regulars only, under the command of Col. Monckton, they took Beau sejour, and immediately all the other forts furrendered.

Thus the only advantages which were derived from all the military preparations against the French in Amenca, were affected by a general unknown to the B——fm-r, and a militia of Americans, and by an expedition planned by the provinces of New England, the last of which exploits the Americans had always in their power to accomplish, unaffisted by men, money, or ships, from this island: whilst the generals and the expeditions appointed by the m--r were either ignominiously defeated, or rendered ineffectual.

The last summer then was productive of the reduction of Nova Scotia, Mr Braddock's defeat, Mr S--y's ineffectual march to O/wego, general Johnson's victory unpursued through deficiency of powers, and his relinquishing the service through disgust.

The campaign being terminated fo little to the advantage of the Americans, the most natural thought which could employ the attention of a statesman, was that of speedily reinforcing those parts against the French attempts, which would undoubtedly be more vigorous the tucceeding summer than the former, as men and ammunitionwould be fent them to sustain the establishments they had made on the back of the British settlements. Let us fee what provision has been made, and how speedily as. sistance has been transmitted to your fellow subjects in those parts, from whence the great source of your wealth and commerce is derived.

The first attempt in their favour was that of creating a regiment of Germans to be enlisted in Europe, and sent thither; whose officers were to be composed of men strangers to this land, and aliens to its liberties and privileges, unproved by experience, guiltless of siege or battle, in whose favour the British subjects of untainted loyalty and approved courage were rejected, and even an express article, in an act relating to the settlement of the present august family on the throne, was suspended by a particular bill in parliament. Notwithstanding all this, transacted in savour of foreigners, no advantage has hitherto accrued to the plantations from that design, neither men or officers being yet sailed to that part.

The winter passed away, the spring was advancing! No g——I appointed! No English troops destined for the succour of America, till on April 15th, the transports set sail with Osway's and Murray's Regiments for America, too late to be of any assistance 'till next spring, unless the French may, peradventure, possess themselves of Virginia, or some other ill defended colony, before their arrival.

In such situation and distress as the provinces remained at the end of last autumn, when the deficiency of generals was so apparent to all comprehensions, is it to be believed, that the commander in chief should have been with held 'till the latter end of May? and yet this has been the real state of the case.

That man, who was to superfede all others in command, has not been sent 'till it is probably become too late for him to perform any thing of consequence this summer. The general in chief, who should have been sent last autumn, and been present in a new country as long as possible before his entering upon action, to be acquainted with the different resolutions of the various provinces, to have known the genius of the inhabitants, planned the expeditions, and created a considence in those who were to obey him, was the last person dispatched on this occasion.

It is but lately that even any one has been sent to America. Within two months Mr Webb has superseded Mr S——y, general Abercrombie Mr Webb, and lord

Loudon all of them: by this deep contrivance, indeed, the m——r has fulfilled the scriptures, which say, the first shall be last, and the last first; yet without the imputation of insidelity, there are those who cannot believe that the chief in command ought to be the least acquainted with the business he is to undertake.

Is there another head in Europe, besides the m——I. which would have fent commanders in this manner? If lord Loudon had gone first, Mr. Webb and general Abercrombie would have followed naturally; and, as they were under him in command, fallen into their places of duty, which are to obey his orders and dispositions; but as the m-r has destined the affair, the commander in chief must now follow the plans of men inferior to himself in military knowledge, or remain inactive; for certainly the preparation for every military expedition, must have been too far advanced before lord Loudon's arrival, to admit of any confiderable alteration; nay, even before Mr. Webb and Abercrombie arrived; fo that Mr S -- y is, in fact, general in planning the operation of this campaign also. How ridiculous then was this m——I disposition in fending out the commanders? Lord Loudon must, from the nature of his commission, which supersedes all others, be imagined superior in every thing relative to the commanding an army, to all who were fent before him; otherways it is the greatest absurdity to have sent him at all; and yet, by pure subtilty of m--l contrivance, he must necessarily be the least acquainted with what he is to undertake, if he arrives time enough for action this campaign; and bound to follow operations already concerted by a man proved unequal to the undertaking, or remain on the defensive. Is not this cunningly subjecting a foldier and man of capacity to all the insufficiency of understanding, in that very person who was so much complained of in the conduct of the last summer's campaign, and defeating the whole expedition for this year? Admirable fagacity!

Besides this inversion of wrong for right, so natural to m——I understandings, in sending the officers of highest rank, it is to be observed, that even the inserior officers of lord Loudon's regiment, together with arms, amunition, and other military preparations. lie at this time * at Portsmouth; and, what is not a little extraordinary, the muskets, and other military weapons, lay a long while on the wharfs, waiting for transports, which were not then hired to take them on board. I fay nothing of the fagacity of that m--l conception, which shipped the carriages of the cannon on board one ship, the cannon on another, the ball on a third, and the powder on a fourth; a contrivance not easily to be paralelled in any ad-n. Hence, by this subtilty of thought, the chance of defeating the whole expedition was increased as four to one; for if each article had been proportionably mixed in the cargoes of the four ships, the taking one ship could have defeated but one fourth of the intention, and fo in proportion; but, as it was defigned, the taking one ship renders the whole useless; how complaisant are the m--s in all their undertakings to your enemies?

To this might be added the 500 Barrels of gun-powder purchased untried of the Dutch, cunningly to prevent it's falling into our enemies hands; which, upon experiment, proved as explosive as saw-dust.

These last mentioned affairs, however, must be considered as below the attention of m-s, whose capacities are so different from the common, and are only a farther confirmation of that great faculty of rightly distinguishing and selecting men, fit to be employed in all stuations under their directions.

If deficiency in the supplies granted by parliament had been the cause of this delay, and inattention to the most valuable of all our foreign possessions, much might have been offered in vindication of a m-r; but fince our most royal master, our most gracious sovereign, in his most gracious speech from the throne, has been pleased to thank his people for the vigorous and effectual support, which has been granted him, what can be faid in defence of men, who have thus abfurdly applied it, shamefully neglecting the most important object of this kingdom? It would be ridiculous to name the cause of this delay:

delay; it must be assigned to that which no man in England is weak enough not to perceive, the m-r excepted.

If then superior knowledge of mankind be necessary in a m-r, to direct him in his choice of those who are to act under him; from these instances, not purposely selected, what hopes remain in you of him who always, undeviating, appoints the least qualified for the task committed to their care?

Having thus fet before you the deficiency in m---1 attention towards providing for the American colonies, without the commerce of which this kingdom must soon languish into a total decay, and shewn, that even the triffing succour hitherto designed since Braddock's defeat, must, by the delay in sending it, be rendered ineffectual during this fummer, let me now turn your eyes on what has been transacted in Europe during that time, in defence of Great Britain and Ireland, together with another dominion, not belonging to this crown, and which to the present minute has been no great source of acquisition to this nation.

In 1755, during the time which passed between the message to both houses, and the prorogation of p-t on the 28th of April, no addition was made to our land forces: no law passed to arm the subjects of Great Britain against any invasion from the French, a neglect which there is too much reason to fear may one day prove fatal to this kingdom; but great sums of money were granted, and the equipping a respectable navy engaged the whole attention of the adm-n.

His m—y having put an end to the session the same day, that no time might be lost, despising the menaces and invalions of the French, let out from St. James's, greatly resquing his sacred person, through seas and tempests, to provide for the defence of his dominions. During his absence, let us recollect what were the occupations of the m-y at home towards this attainment: they were employed in committing violence on your liberties, depressing the courage of sailors by compulsion, manning fleets, which have been almost useless by their destinati( 14 ) on, and leaving the island open to the hourly invasion of the French, through deficiency of domestic force.

However, to the immortal memory of the m—r, this inattention at home was amply recompensed by his care on the other side the water. Two treaties, supposed to be teeming with advantages to this nation, were concluded: one with the empress of Russia, and the other with the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel; the first signed at Petersburgh, the 30th of September 1755, the other at Hanover the 18th of June the same year.

The first article with Russia, confirms the treaty concluded in 1744, by which the empress agrees to surnish the king of Great Britain with 10,000 infantry, and 2000 cavalry, it his m—y's dominions should be attacked, or with 500,000 rubles in money, yearly, during the attack. Neither of which having been demanded during the last rebellion in Scotland, it seems no unjust inference to conclude, that that treaty related to H—r only; otherwise, by what argument shall we justify our m—y, who, during that time of peril and expence, neglected to make that necessary requisition of the troops, or money, in favour of England, stipulated in the treaty.

These forces being deemed insufficient in the present emergency, it was thought prudent to increase the number to 55,000, 40,000 of which, were to be infantry, and 15,000 cavalry; added to this, 40 or 50 gallies were to hold themselves in readiness to act on the first orders.

Besides what has been already said, relating to the treaty of 1745, which makes the basis of this, the fourth article in the second treaty with Russia, confirms its being defigned for the defence of H-r only.

It is there faid, that these troops and gallies shall not act except his Britannic majesty or his allies are attacked; and then the commanding officer, as soon as he shall receive his majesty's requisition, shall make a diversion with 30,000 infantry, and the 15,000 cavalry: and, at the same time, shall embark the other 10,000 infantry on board the gallies, in order to make a descent according to the exigency of affairs.

Now, does not the second article, by agreeing that those troops shall be held in readiness on the frontiers of Livonia, and the gallies cruifing on that coast, declare the intention to be that of invading the Prussian territories, if the king of Prussia shall attempt any thing against the H-n dominions? otherways the stipulation, that the commanding officer shall make a diversion with 30,000 infantry, and 15,000 cavalry, as foon as he shall receive his majesty's requisition, would appear a palpable absurdity; because these troops, which are to make this immediate diversion in favour of his majesty, cannot march into France in much less time than fix months, if she should invade this island: this diversion then, to be put in execution as scon as the requisition shall be made on the part of Great Britain, cannot mean an attack upon France; much less can their marching to the aid of this kingdom be the intention of that article, unless the same m-r, who, twelve months fince, did not know that Cape Breton is an island, had not at the time of concluding this treaty heard, that Great Britain is surrounded by the ocean.

Besides this, gallies being unfit vessels for transporting troops on the ocean, and the circumstance of being ordered to make a descent, according to the exigency of as-fairs, with 10,000 forces, prove, that these also were defigned to affift the former number, in whatever they should attempt, and neither to invade France nor succour England. The term descent being always understood in a hostile sense, cannot well be intended to signify their coming hither as friends, and the number is too small to attempt an undertaking of that kind on the shores of France.

In consequence of this Agreement then for the defence of the e-- l dominions, the empress of Russia is to be paid by Great Britain, 100,000 l. annually, during the term of four years in times of peace; and as foon as those troops shall pass the frontiers of her country, 500,000 l. a year. In consideration of this augmentation of her subsidy, the empress is to take upon herself the payment, sublistence, and transporting her troops, whereever they shall be ordered by Great Britain, and not to re-call re-call them 'till the expiration of the treaty, though her own dominions should be attacked.

This article of the treaty is yet another confirmation, that it excludes all idea of the Russians being ever intended to defend this island; because the pay of an equal number of British troops, in the same proportion of horse and foot, would annually amount to 1,700,000. Now is it possible to conceive, the Russian empress can have agreed to support those forces in England, where provisions are dear, on less than a third part of that sum, and where the pay of each national soldier is but just sufficient for his subsistence? Would not this be a kind of compact to starve her own subjects? much less would she oblige herself to the transporting them for the same money, which expence alone would consume the whole subsidy.

Indeed, by the 11th, a truly Christian article, it is agreed, that the Russians shall have full liberty to plunder wherever they come; this auxiliary consideration, as they would not fail to put it in execution, might probably prove an ample recompence for the smallness of their pay, after their arrival in England.

However, as I think it my duty to do justice to all mankind, weak as our m——I leaders may be; it appears, I own, too rank a contradiction, want of capacity, and inattention to their own interest, to have made a positive compact, that foreign troops shall interfere in the occupation and advantages peculiar to themselves, of plundering the people of E——d.

Wherefore, from this article alone it ought to be concluded, that this treaty was made folely for the interest of H—r; and you the innocent subjects of E— $d_r$  were thereby doomed to a more severe fate than the Almighty imposed on your first parents, who rebelled against his will; ye must now not only get your own daily bread by the sweat of your brows, but even labour for the bread of others, who have no natural claim on you, and with whom ye have no connection. Thus the trade and toil of Englishmen must be annually employed in gaining half a million of money for the fole ease and safety of the subjects of H--r.

Notwithstanding these proofs to the contrary, if any one chuses to believe this treaty included any immediate reference to the affilting this kingdom of G - tB - n, he has my full consent, even then it will soon appear I imagine a small justification of m ____ l proceedings.

Amongst the many precautions which all wife m____s have observed in concluding treaties, there have been two from which they have never swerved; the first is, that in all subsequent treaties they have observed the Arichest care, that no alliance with a weaker potentate, shall defeat the advantages of former treaties made with a stronger; without attending to this observation, m--s lessen their powers by every new acquisition of allies, a fubtilty not much unlike the denying the use of arms to the subjects of a kingdom, for their own defence during war, and trusting to hireling foreigners.

The fecond is, that the honour and interest of the nation, which they superintend, are to be the great objects of all m___s in their treaties with foreign nations. Without due regard to this observation, states, like dupes at play, become the beggared object of ridicule to all crowned heads.

Let us now enquire, whether these two esential maxims have been judiciously pursued by the m-s of E___d, in their treaties with Russia, Hesse-Cassel, and Pruffia.

In order the more clearly to effect this, we must place things in the same situation they were before either of these treaties was concluded.

Before the conclusion of the treaty with the empress of Russia, the m  $\longrightarrow$  s of E  $\longrightarrow$  d were under no small apprehensions of the Prussian's laying hold of the growing differences between  $G_{-}$  t  $B_{-}$  n and France, and possessing himself of some of the electoral dominions. This his undertaking, though of no difadvantage to G\_\_\_\_\_t B\_\_\_\_n, might prove, notwithstanding, a most embarxassing circumstance, if a war should break out on the continent, to the m-s of this nation, whose constant pursuit it has been to prefer the H—n to B—fbinterests.

To difengage themselves from this perplexity, it was thought necessary to conclude the treaty as above specified with Russia; and indeed it must be acknowledged, that the prospect of things, by this new alliance with Rusfia, was greatly improved in respect to H-r. The Prussian, who before this subsidiary treaty with the Muscovite, had entertained fanguine hopes of enlarging his dominions, was now reduced to fear lest his own territories might be diminished by this new alliance.

This treaty then with Ruffia, fetting the interest of this island out of the question, which it has constantly been for this forty years, whenever it came in competition with that of Germany, was truly beneficial to the electorate of  $L_{--r}$ ; it included the two advantages above mentioned, of increasing power by alliance for the people it was intended, and honour to the m --- s, if men can merit fuch reward, who neglect the welfare of their own country to serve that of foreigners.

The 55,000 Russian troops were undoubtedly an augmentation of the powers of H--r and its allies, as it fubjected the Pruffian king, their suspected foe, and whose interests are as incompatible with the Austrian, as those of heaven and hell, to no small terrors on account of Silesia, if the empress queen should fix her heart on reposfessing that gem, which had been plucked from her imperial diadem, and which she still beholds with longing eyes. At the same time then that the Prussian, by his dread of the Russian arms, was rendered incapable of annoying the ele——I dominions; the friendship between H--r and the empress queen, who considered this treaty as made in her favour, was greatly strengthened; particularly as the latter entertained hopes of their being employed in her service in the recovery of Silesia, if the Prussian should intermeddle in the quarrel between the king of G—t B—n and France; or in Flanders, if the French should attack that part of her dominions. Thus the Prussian king, by means of this treaty between G-t B-n and Russia, was placed in that very anxious dilemma from which H--r had been just extricated.

This was the very fituation in which it was the business of the E—sh m—s to place and secure him, and to extricate himself as expeditiously as possible, was the great object of the Prussian: let us now enquire which of these has ultimately attained the ends of their endeavours.

No man faw more perspicuously than the Prussian prince, how greatly the scale of advantages was turned in favour of H—r and Austria, by the treaty between G—t B—n and Russia; he therefore set about devising some means, by which to relieve himself from this disquieting dilemma; in consequence of which design, from his own pure inclination, without overture from E—d, it seems, he proposes a treaty between this kingdom and Russia which was specific applied.

Prussia, which was speedily concluded.

At this time it was, that the mercenary tongue-pads were let loofe in favour of the wisdom of our m—s in the Russian treaty; the falutary and humiliating consequences which it had produced on Prussia, and the beneficial alliance which had been so long wished, and at length completed between the two crowns. Let us now examine, whether this last treaty with Prussia has been productive of all those blessings, which it was boasted to have brought upon its wings; or whether like the drone it has not brought the sting only without the honey.

The two most material articles in this treaty are, first, that G-t B--n with her allies, and Prusia, shall mutually assist each other in endeavouring to keep all foreign troops from entering the empire.

The second, that Great Britain shall pay 20,000 l. as an indemnification for the captures of that merchandize which was taken on board Prussian bottoms, condemned and sold during the last war; and in return, that had most sagaciously engaged to keep them from their assistance. And thus those men, who valued themselves so highly for concluding the treaty with Russia, to bring her forces into Germany, were now artfully engaged by the king of Prussia to oppose the entrance of the very troops which they had hired in their favour.

Prussia shall pay the Silesia-loan.

C 2 bad

By this single article, did not the king of Prussia find himself quite extricated from all the difficulties in which the Ruffian creaty had involved him?

If the empreis should attack Silesia, he had now no other affair upon his hands but that of opposing her arms; because the m—s of G-tB-n had by treaty agreed to keep out the Russians, and free him from apprehensions on that side; from this change of circumstances, the empress-queen grew disgusted with the B-h m-r; The saw herself and her interests deserted, her friendship and alliance rejected and renounced in favour of a weaker potentate: and from that time, being convinced of the weakness of the B- 1/2 m -- r, entertained the idea of feeking the alliance of a stronger and wifer power: thus Pruffia has totally defeated the sole advantage, which the Russian treaty had given the states of  $E \longrightarrow d$  and  $H \longrightarrow r$  over him, and this kingdom and the electoral dominions lost the use of the Auftrian powers, by preferring a weaker alliance to a stronger.

Let us now suppose that France, notwithstanding this treaty between G-t B-n and Prussia, should resolve to attack the H-n dominions, what advantage can redound to that electorate from this convention between G-t B-n and Prussia, to oppose the entrance of all soreign troops into the empire? Will the m-s of this isse and those of H-r rely on this treaty with Prussia, and conside in the forces of that prince to prevent the French from invading the H-n dominions? or if they should entertain this considence, and act in consequence of it, will the Prussian march his army in their defence, and give such an opportunity to the empression queen of recovering Silesia, whilst he is deserting his own dominions, to fight the battles of H - r.

I imagine no man believes, either that the m—s would confide in Prussia on fuch an occasion, or that king desert his own interests to follow those of others.

If the French then, notwithstanding this convention with Pruss a, should march towards the territories of H---r, it feems evident that the Ruffians, according to treaty, must still be invited to the assistance of the electoral dominions; in fuch a case, of what contradictory and clashing circumstances will the two treaties appear to be composed?

The treaty with Pruffia obliges the m-s to exclude the Russians, and all foreigners, from the German empire; that with Russia, to call them to the aid of the electorate into Germany.

Thus the Russian troops, which, by the agreement with that empress, are to come as friends to the assistance of H-r, are, by the treaty with Prussian, to be opposed by those very H — ns, as enemies.

In confequence of this alliance with Prussia, if the French forces should march to invade the electoral state, and the Russians to defend it, at the requisition of our m—s, the H—-ns are obliged by compact to become fo many drawcanfirs, and kill both friends and foes.

By the alliance with Prussia they are engaged to keep out the Russians; the moment then the Muscovites begin to march, according to treaty, and the request of our m—-r, to the assistance of H—-r, the treaty with Prusfia obliges the H—————ns to divide their troops with those of that monarch, and march one half to resist the coming of their allies the Russians, and one half to resist their foes the French: what an illustrious instance of refined and profound politics is here produced!

By this judicious proceeding, our m-rs have fairly diverted the H—ns of the Ruffian Assistance; for, if they rely on the alliance with Prussia, the Russians cannot act in their favour; and if they claim the aid of the Ruffians, one half of the H—n foldiers are, by compact with Piussia, obliged to join and oppose the very troops they call to their assistance.

In this manner, in obedience to treaty, the electorate will be deprived of one half of her troops wherewith to engage the French, because they must be employed to oppose her friends the Russians.

This must be the necessary consequence of the treaties with Russia and Prussia, if both are put into execution; for, unless the H—ns oppose the Russians equally as the French, from entering the empire, the Prussian is entirely disengaged from all obligation between him and the B-fb m—rs, and the H—ns are the first infracters of the treaty. Wherefore, as it is impossible, from the nature of things, that the H-ns can oppose the Russians, which they have called to their assistance, it follows, that the Prussian cannot act at all, because he would injure the H—ns more, in opposing the Russians, by calling off one half of the electoral troops, than affift them in opposing the French.

Thus the refult of this boafted wisdom of the m-r, in the union between G-t B-n and Pruffia, is at last no more than a dexterous deliverance of the latter from that peril he was fallen into by the Russian treaty. He is at ease from all the fears which that alliance had imparted on the account of Silesia; disengaged from all obligation in his agreement with E - d, by the abfurdity of our m—s, and the almost impossibility of its being put in execution; and may not improbably, by virtue of this alliance, be supported against the house of Austria, by the very Russians which our m-s originally had hired to oppose him.

Have they not then thus cunningly deprived themfelves of all the advantages which the treaty with Russia had given them? Have they not, by renouncing the Austrian interest, displeased the empress queen; and, by this alliance with a weaker power, rendered themselves less able to resist the French arms in Germany? Have they not united the houses of Bourbon and Austria, after having spent 300 millions to keep them asunder? and to support the latter in opposition to the former. Is it possible then, that those m—s, who have been so easily circumvented by the Prussian king, could ever have perceived the force and efficacy of that treaty with Russia? Ought not then the Muscovite alliance to be deemed the pure effect of chance or malice (which the article on plundering seems to insinuate), as that with Prussia, the legitimate child of ignorance and mistake?

After having, in the above manner, shown the effects of the first article in the Prussian treaty, which, indeed, concerns the H——n welfare immediately only, let us consider the consequences of the second article with respect to G - t B - n, in which the B - f m—rs agree to give 20,000 l. to the king of Prussia, in lieu of merchandize taken on board Prussian bottoms, condemned and fold during last war; and that prince to pay the subjects of this island the remainder of the Silesia loan.

Absurd as the first article has been proved to be, this second is not one step behind it in mistake and ridicule, and even before it in pernicious consequences; for as that first article, by having united Austria and France, may now cost this island two millions of money, in supporting the Russians for the interest of Prussia, if Silesia should be attacked; so the second article of the agreement bids fair to destroy all the commerce of G-t R—-n, at least all the advantage she can draw from a fuperior fleet in time of war.

The merchandize repaid for by this treaty, was what had been legally taken, condemned, and fold. The equity of this proceeding had been defended, and our right justified, in a letter from the m-r to the Prustian court; and much more so in a memorial drawn by a lawyer and civilian, whose eminence and learning do honour to this nation. Nay, it was even afferted by these men, that the welfare and existence of this state, as a maritime power, essentially depended on our persevering in our right to these captures; and this, I believe, is the opinion of all men of understanding in the nation.

Notwithstanding which, in contradiction to all good sense and sound policy, restitution for these captures has been made to Prussia.

By this concession, we either acknowledge that we have no right to feize military stores, designed for our enemies, on board neutral bottoms; that the decrees of that nation, on board whose ships they are taken, are valid, though contradictory to those made in the courts of G-t B-n; or that our m-s are become fuch timid and abject wretches, that whatever crowned head, however contemptible on the feas, shall dare to dispute the legality of seizing and confiscating such stores, shall be repaid whatever his subjects may lose.

I am sensible the m—s affert, that this 20,000 l. was not given to the king of Prussia as an indemnisication for the captures made last war, but because they had a mind to present him so much of that money, which you labour to procure for them to squander.

Is not this answer to the full as childish as the article is pernicious; like two boys at school, where one gives the other money not to be beaten, and yet insists it was not through fear but pure love. Does this excuse him from the imputation of cowardice, or change the motive in the opinion of his school-fellows? Will not he be infulted by all the others as much as if he had confessed the true reason?

This illustrious instance of want of sense and want of resolution must have an advantageous tendency at the eve of a war. Will not the Prussian still insist upon the right of carrying stores in his ships to your enemies? Will not the Dutch, Russians, Danes, and Swedes, with all the other maritime states of Europe, demand, put in use, and support the like privilege for themselves, which you have already granted to the Pruff an? and, if you oppose this liberty, will not your captures of their ships, however legal, draw the resentment and arms of all Europe upon you?

What then is the advantage of the payment of the Silessa loan, when compared to the dreadful consequences of this concellion? How will you now diffress effectually the commerce of your enemies, if your m-s permit neutral ships to transport and traffic, not only in the common produce and merchandize of France, and her colonies, but even in military stores, to the destruction of all your trade and security? will you longer vaunt your empire of the ocean?

Thus then, as by the former article, the m—rs of this k—m had effectually destroyed the good effects of the Russian treaty with respect to H—r, in this they have given a fatal wound to the interest and honour of G—t B—n. Destined, as ye are, to labour for G-r welfare, how will ye support the expence of those millions which it must cost, when the source of all your riches, your trade, is destroyed?

Now let me ask those hireling trumpeters of the m—I wisdom in concluding the Prussian treaty, what are the boasted advantages which are derived from it to this kingdom? Is the conclusion stronger in favours of m—I wisdom or m—I weakness? and what has this nation to expect under the direction of such penetrating and all-seeing m—s who have, by two articles in one treaty, driven Austria from their interest, united her with France, adopted the weak alliance of Prussia, laid H—r open to French invasion, destroyed the commerce of G—t B—n, and rendered our arms and councils contemptible in the opinion of all Europe?

Having thus, in some degree, explained the pernicious essents of the Prussian treaty, let us examine what advantages are likely to be derived to this kingdom from that with Hesse-Cossel, and what are the merits of the m-r in making it, and behaving in consequence of its con-

The great object of this treaty is, that either 8 or 12000 troops, as  $G \longrightarrow t B \longrightarrow n$  shall require, of which the fixth part is to be horse, are to be surnished by the Landgrave of Hesse for this kingdom or her allies, and to be paid for by E - d only.

Let

Let us see whether this last duty of public parlimony has been more closely pursued in the alliance with Hesse, than those of power and honour were observed by that with Prusia.

By the fifth article it is agreed, that every trooper shall first be purchased at about 20 l. Sterling, and every soot soldier at about 7 l. which, in all, makes about 112,000 l. levy money; besides this, the Landgrave is to have about 37,000 l. annually before the troops march; and, as soon as they march, he is to receive 74,000 l. annually, till they enter into pay according to that of H—r or E—d; at which time the subsidy returns to about 37,000 l. annually; which again, when the troops are sent back, is to return to 74,000 l. a year, during the whole duration of the treaty, which is four years.

In the mean time, whatever men or horses die by disease, or are killed in battle, the beast is to be paid for at double the price of the human being; a blessed consideration for the subjects of German princes!

In like manner, whatever arms or artillery shall be found desicient, or taken by the enemy, a full recompence is to be made by G - t B - n to the Landgrave of Hesse.

By the tenth article, these troops shall be instantly fent back whenever the dominions of the Landgrave shall be attacked.

Let us now, in obedience to the inclinations of the m-r, allow, that the Russians, as well as the Hessians, were by treaty obliged to come to the affistance of G-t B-n. It being at length determined, that France would certainly invade this island; that the B--fb forces were unequal to the repelling a hostile invasion; that the subjects of E-d should not be armed in the defence of themselves, their king and country; and that foreign mercenaries were necessary for our protection and safety; let us then explain with what admirable fore-thought, prudence, and oeconomy, the m-s have proceeded with respect to the security of this land in the requisition of troops, according to the two treaties.

Fifty five thousand troops are, by compact with Rusfia, to be fent by the empress of that nation to assist  $E_{RS}$ land; these forces she is to transport and sustain for the annual subsidy of 500,000l. without any farther consideration for death of men and horses, or loss of military stores, and no return of them is to take place during four years, if the Russian's dominions should be hostilely invaded,

Notwithstanding these conditions of this treaty are so favourable in price and frugality, no requisition of Russians has been made in behalf of G - t B - n, but eight thousand Hessians are brought into England, the expence of which will amount this year, as the m____s confess, including levy money, subsidy to the Landgrave, death of men and horses, transporting hither and back again, and pay, to a million Sterling.

Thus this military aid in Hessians, costing double the money that feven times that affiftance would have done in Russians, is fourteen times as expensive: a plain proof how different the bargains are which are made between this nation and the Germans, and this nation and Russians; and how much oeconomy in the public money, and the defence of this island, enter into the transactions of the m-r with German princes.

One article of frugality in the public money must not be omitted. Amongst the troops landed in E - d, there are about 900 horses, which, one with another, are not worth more than 4 l. a piece; notwithstanding which, each of these horses has already cost about 12 1. levy money, and 9 % in being transported hither; after this, 12 l. more is to be paid for each horse which dies in the island; thus every dead Hessian horse will cost this nation 33 l. eight times the real value, and becomes to the Landgrave worth three times more dead than alive. Is it not then the interest of the Landgrave, and the duty of the commanding officer, to take special care that none of these cattle ever revisit their native land; however, if any of them should survive, 9 l. more are to be paid for the re-transportation of each; thus the hire of every Hessian horse, worth 41. will then be only 30 l. expence to you; not quite eight times his value.

From this article may it not be justly inferred, that our m—s are as unskilled in beasts as men, and that this kingdom is the best market for German carrion in all Europe?

Another advantage attending the Russian treaty, nor to be found in the Helsian, besides number and cheapness, is, that the Russians are by agreement obliged to remain here to your assistance, though the empress, their mistress, should be attacked.

This mistake, or something more criminal, in preferring the aid of 8000 Hessians to 55,000 Russians; and walting a million of money for the seventh part of the assistance, which may be rendered useless also, one would have imagined might have been sufficient to give the m—s an intimation of their error in the application of the treaties. Nothing appears to be less true; it being conceived, that the kingdom was not yet sufficiently protected from French invasion, it was agreed to request the e—r of H—r, your dear ally, that he would be graciously disposed to save this nation, by assisting the king of G - t B - n with 8000 of his troops.

Here again the Russian treaty was totally neglected. It was judged more eligible to apply for H—ns, at a fresh expence, than to make a requisition of the Russian troops. In consequence of this opinion, the p—t requested, and the kingdom was favoured with, 8000 H—n forces, which are since arrived. Does not this proceeding afford a fresh instance of m—l profusion; for though though the fum granted on this account is vastly short of what the m-s confess will be the expence of the Hessians, without the gift of prophecy one may venture to predict, that, at the conclusion, when the application of the million, granted by the vote of credit, comes to be specified, this expence will be equal to that of the Hefstans; because I am convinced, the great wisdom and knowledge of the e-r of H-r, in concluding all fubsidiary treaties, is in no sense inserior to that of the Landgrave of Hesse Cassel. According to this way of rea-foning, 8000 Hessians and 8000 H—ns may cost two millions of money; four times the fum of almost four times the number of Russians. Add to this, the probability of the H-ns being less liable to tarry to your asfiftance than the Hessians, as H-r will more likely be attacked than Hesse, it may not improbably happen, that these two millions will be uselessly wasted in subsidies and other expences on foreign troops, which cannot be of fervice in protecting  $G_{-t}B_{--n}$ , whilft those that might be are entirely neglected and unrequested.

It was expected indeed, by every fensible and honest Englishman, that as the Russians were now visibly hired for the defence of H—r only, that the H—r were to come hither in lieu of those Russians; and that, as G—t B—r now paid 55,000 Muscovite forces to defend the ele—r, that the 8000 H—r were to be at the same expence by way of exchange to pro-

This fuggestion, however reasonable it may seem, proves by no means true in the event; for not only the H—ns as well as Russians are paid by G—t B—n, but there is too much cause to suspect, that yet another bargain is concluded for 8000 Holsteiners, since even the m—r had not the hardiness to contradict that affertion, when he was called upon to be paid for with B—sh money, that H—r may lose no defence by the absence of those troops which are arrived to the assistance of E—d. What a stupendous instance is this again of m—l prosusion in favour of German states and neglect of E—sh: 500,000 l. annual subsidy to Russia, added added to a million for H—ns, tack'd to half that sum, Suppose for Holsteiners, make two millions of money for the feeble fuccour of 8000 H—ns, to be paid by E—d, which troops after all, it is probable, may not tarry four months for the protection of this island.

Thus the preferring Hessians to Russians, at fourteen times the expence, is here again doubled, and the 8000 H-ns are chosen at the proportion of twenty eight times the cost which was agreed to be given for the Rus-Sians.

In this manner, the fervants of the public, the guar-which, by this happy contrivance, will probably be of the least importance or security to this island; unless rendering you poor and despicable, and dooming your hands to triple labour, for raising money to pay these foreign mercenaries, be a public benefit to this k-m.

Mistaken, absurd, and profuse as this requisition of H---ns and Hessians, in preference to Russians, may appear to be, it is not yet by ten thousand degrees equally pernicious in its effects with that resolution, which has been taken against permitting you, natives of E-d, to protect yourselves, your king, and country.

By this act, the m—rs have subjected you, either to the invasion of your enemies, or the arbitrary will of mercenary troops, invited hither under the notion of protecting you.

The militia bill, that necessary law, devised for entrusting arms to your hands, had for its objects the most laudable motives; defence of yourselves, your s-n, and your country.

The fecurity of these was to have been effectuated by a militia, consisting of 62,680 men, levied, cloathed, and paid by the trifling fum of 175,197 l. and which the succeeding year would not have amounted to two thirds of that money; eight times the defence of the H--n, forces, and yet not one tenth part of the expence; including also in its favour, what no sums of money can purchase, purchase, the love of their king and country, animated by the desence of their wives, children, and properties.

This measure, so necessary in itself, which would have rendered you at the same time free from the sears of hostile invasion, and the conquest of mercenary and pretended friends: this measure, reputable for the subject, parsimonious of public money, honourable to the m—r, glorious to the k—g, salutary to the constitution, and beneficial to the country, was rejected for inattention, profusion, disgrace, dishonour, insecurity, and ruin; freemen gave way to slaves, Britons to foreigners, liberty to thraldom: is there then the bosom of one Englishman, which still remains unwounded with the idea of this ignominious treatment? accused as ye are of cowardice or disloyalty; cowardice, if your loyalty is unsuspected; disloyalty, if ye are yet esteemed a brave nation; disloyalty to such a significant of the country to such a significant of the country to such a significant of the country of the same of the cowardice of the suspense of the

Having now, in some degree, placed the conduct of the m—rs in its just light, as it respects their behaviour in providing for America, H—r and G—t B—n, by land armies and treaties, let me turn your eyes on the administration of naval affairs, and candidly examine, whether symptoms of a more extensive capacity and

greater prudence have appeared in conducting this part of the m——I province than in the former.

In January 1755, the press for manning the B--sb fleet beganwith great violence. Scarce any age or quality preserved the brave seamen from this violation of B--- B liberty; every dock-yard resounded with innumerable strokes of axes, caulking hammers, screaking tackles, and cries of workmen. Pitch, tarr, and uproar, filled the towns of Chatham, Portsmouth and Plymouth; dispatch, panegyric, and my lord ---, were united in the mouths of all men! no time could furnish an instance of fuch capacity in the head of the ad -- as the prefent, and even the diligence of Mr - at Plymouth dock, who had most amazingly, by means of thirty coopers made 100 tons of cask in twenty four hours, to supply admiral Boscawen's fleet, was attributed to the great fagacity and forefight of this great m-r in naval affairs.

And indeed it must be acknowledged, that the merit of this expedition in cask-making of the agent victualler at Plymouth dock, was as much due to this great naval m——r (of which he knew nothing 'till it was completed) as any other part of marine preparation.

The officers who preside in the king's yards, have indeed a just claim to the praise of this kingdom for their diligence in equipping ships of war; to them, and to the great quantity of naval stores long laid in, it was owing that ships were so speedily prepared for the sea; for which reason, my sacrilegious hand shall never rob the cottage of the deserving man in low life, to decorate the palace of the undeserving, to whom chance has given riches and titles; or erect a trophy to a 1—d from spoils which common men have won.

A parrot which could have pronounced by authority, equip ten ships at Chatham, ten at Portsmouth, and ten at Plymouth, would as effectually and as speedily have produced a fleet ready for the seas as the voice of the first 1--d of the ad——y, and deserved as great an encomium for the transaction.

The completion of the bulinels was effected where he was not prefent, without one new invention, uncommon exertion, or peculiar attention of the understanding; and which, after the order had escaped his lips, whether he had been asleep or awake, dreaming or pretending to think, in his easy chair or on horseback, would have been equally completed in the same time.

Let us now examine, whether the man who has in this manner been extolled to the skies, as the best adapted for naval ad --- n; by the merits of boatiwains, gunners, ship-wrights, and dock-officers, and what he did not perform, has proved himself, in the execution of those duties which belong to him in chief, equal to the post in which he has presided; and deserving that applause, which in the beginning was so liberally bestowed upon him. To accomplish this, permit me to enquire preparations in January 1753.

The first instance in which the great knowledge of this president in maritime ad---n was exhibited to the public, was in that expedition in which Mr Boscawen was ordered to intercept the French fleet, designed to carry and convoy stores to the affistance of Canada. The whole of this remarkable exhibition of knowledge in marine affairs, has been already explained in a first letter to the people of E-d; in which it has been proved, that the number of the enemy's ships was unknown to our ad ----, or not attended to; that our fleet was infufficient to the undertaking, if the destination of it had been, as it ought, before Brest; because Macramara's squadron was superior to the English at his leaving that port; for the same reason had he continued his voyage to America, Mr Besteawen and Mr Holbourne, by the weakness and division of their fleets, would probably have fallen a prey to that of the French; and even as it did happen, though the fleet of France was rendered inferior to that of Mr Boscawen by Mr Mainamara's return to Brest, all power of reaping any confiderable advantage from it was defeated, by the English fleet being destined to cruize on the banks of Newfoundland in those months when that station is covered with one general fog and darkness.

The French fleet being arrived in the river St. Lawrence, without any injury which could defeat the purport of their undertaking, the same genius which had so manifestly erred in the disposition of every article in Mr Boscawen's voyage, was now determined to make ample atonement to his country for this desiciency of judgment, and by distributing the E—fs fleet in such a manner, that not a French ship of war should escape it in her return to France, demonstrate that he was yet equal to the supreme conduct of the E—fs navy.

Mr Boscawen being ordered home, Mr Holbourne was communanted to cruize between cape Breton and the south western parts of Newfoundland, to intercept the French sleet returning from the river St. Lawrence, which service he punctually performed. Now it was that the m——I advocates were extremely clamorous in their panegyrics on the destination of this sleet, and him who had ordered it; notwithstanding which, it seems impossible to omit observing the parallelarity of judgment in this assair, between our first—— of the ad———— and a justice of peace in the western parts of England.

It feems some time last summer, a thief who had robbed, and been apprehended, a desperate fellow, had escaped from before the justice, and flying to another house had bolted the door, and secured himself in one room of it. The constable, who had followed to this retreat, knowing the rashness of the man, and the nature of his fituation, conceived no small apprehensions of danger in attacking him in that place; he therefore with great prudence acquainted his worship with the circumstances of the affair. The justice, after mature deliberation, wisely considered it was impossible that the thief, was he ever to brave, through want of provision and other necessaries, could long remain in that post; he therefore ordered the fiege to be turned into a blockade, and bade the conflable and his affiftants to tarry before the door; watch the door, Tom, says his worship to the constable.

stable, through that door he must come, therefore mind

the door, and he cannot possibly escape us.

This being refolved on, nothing could be more alert than the contable, and no men in bigher spirits than his gang. The commander, as soon as it was dark, placed a lanthorn and candle at the door to see all that might pass from or to the house, and during the whole night most manfully with his affociates stood on his arms, ready prepared, with his staff in his hand, happily to demolish the thief the moment he should pretend to sally and escape him.

This duty being performed through the length of two whole days and two whole nights, the justice in momentary expectation of hearing that the thief was taken, and the constable haranguing the mob, which attended on the thief's perseverance; at the same time wondering, that he had not been obliged to furrender thro' drought and hunger: when an old acquaintance of the belieged arrived with intelligence, that he had met the thief the first morning after his confinement, at the break of day, twenty miles from that very house in which the justice had to that moment imagined he was closely shut up: in fact, the fagacious head of the justice had never conceived, that, notwithstanding a door may be bolted ever so strong, and watched ever so diligently, a man might get out at the window, as it really happened in this very case.

In like manner, whilft Mr H—ne, according to the orders of his superior, was cruizing at the door between Newfoundland and cape Breton, and the marine m—r believed Dubois de la Mothe still confined and starving in the river St. Lawrence, that sly Frenchman slipt through the window, between the northern parts of Newfoundland and the continent, by the streights of Pellisse, unsufpected by the penetrating spirit of our first d—r in marine affairs; so that he heard de la Mothe and his squadron were safely arrived at Brest, before he knew he had quitted the river St. Lawrence.

Thus then, in the conduct of this naval transaction, there are to be found five very conspicuous instances of most confummate ignorance; first the ignorance of the number of the enemy's ships; secondly, the insufficiency of the English fleet; thirdly, their not being ordered to cruize before Brest; fourthly, their being ordered to cruize where they could not fee their enemy; and fifthly, to cruize between Newfoundland and cape Breton, to intercept a fleet which did not pass that way.

This justice, however, must be done the marine m-r to his honour; the first ignorance of a proper station for cruizing, preserved the English fleet from the danger of the last ignorance of the number of the enemy's fleet, and insufficiency of our own.

Notwithstanding this uniform concatenation of errors, there are those who attempt to justify this conduct, by faying it was impossible for Mr Holbourne's fleet to attempt intercepting de la Mothe's in both passages, because his squadron was not sufficiently strong to suffer a division for that purpose? Why then did the marine m-r expose himself to ridicule, in attempting to do that which he ought to have known must have proved ineffectual, and risk the destruction of his master's ships, by rocks and tempests, in those seas, where they could meet no adverfary and do no fervice? did my lord Winchelsea ever conceive so fruitless an attempt, or commit 10 egregious a mistake?

Hence then it may be gathered, that if hereafter any naval captain, indulged with five ships, at the expence of 500,000 % of the nation's money, to make a fortune for himself, shall fail round the globe, and by the very utmost effort of all possible chances, like throwing twenty aces on twenty dice the first time, take a ship worth a million of money for his and his company's advantage; that though he does not furround a weaker man than himself, he may yet preside and direct the whole navy of E - d to the ruin of the kingdom.

Such fatality, according to the present fashionable phrase of excuse, having attended the conduct of this naval expedition in every particular! a fatality doomed to attend insufficient judgments nine times in ten, since the creation! a fresh instance offers itself, of reinstating our marine m—r in the popular opinion, which began greatly to decline in his favour.

It seems monsseur du Guay, a French admiral, was arrived at Cadiz, with fix ships of the line, in his way to Brest. This admiral, and this squadron, the same naval genius, who had so wisely destined the former fleet of

E - d, was determined to intercept.

He remembered the errors which had been imputed to his charge in the destination of Boscawen's fleet, insufficiency in force, and wrong appointment in the station of cruizing; he was therefore determined to avoid these two mistakes, at least at this time. Accordingly, on the 18th of July, Mr Hawke, with eighteen fail of the line. was fent to intercept the fix French ships under the command of du Guay; and with this whole fleet, fo superior to the enemy, to cruize off cape Finisterre, 'till the French ships should appear.

This exploit again was trumpeted forth by m-1 hirelings, as an insuperable proof of great marine knowledge in the director. The station was happily chosen, the number of the ships sufficient, and the game sure. Here was nothing for the most malevolent disposition to blame: envy must now be dumb, or, if it spoke, speak in the praise of this design: and yet a mistake, much like the former in its consequences, prevailed also at this time; and in this manner it must prevail, when designs miscarry, not from accidents, for which men of sense may be pardoned in not foreseeing, but from radical insufficiency and understanding.

It scems that the same head, which had conceived that there was but one way of failing from Canada to Brest, and had never thought of the streights of Belliste, had in this place imagined the fea like Hownflow heath, where a man may fit on horseback on one fide and see what passes on the other, and that all ships which are steering to Brest from Cadiz, are obliged to turn the corner at cape Finisterre, like race horses at a post, or lose their voyage. Probably this great naval m-r had reasoned much in the following manner: all ships, which have no enemy to fear or avoid, in their course from Cadiz to Brest, make cape Finisterie: wherefore, every ship which knows there is an enemy in the way, and has reason to be under apprehension of danger, will certa nly sail the same way; and therefore Mr Hawke shall be destined to cruize off cape Finisterie to intercept them. Admirable instance of sea logic! Without reasoning in this manner, is it possible he could have destined the fleet as he did?

Monsieur du Guay, however, it seems, from the same principles, drew inferences diametrically opposite; and in order to avoid the usual course which is steered from Cadiz to Brest, sailed directly west from Spain into the Assantic ocean; when being at a great distance from the coast, he changed his course and stood directly for the land's-end of E—d. By this precaution of sailing west to a great distance before he steered towards the channel, he passed on the outside of all our sleet cruizing at cape Finisterre; and arriving safely in the channel, fell in behind it with his squadron, and got safe into the harbour of Brest.

Such was the event of this second exhibition of boasted marine knowledge! Avoiding the errors of the former conduct generated the very miscarriage of this; and so it will for ever happen to men, who fancy, that by Anunning the mistakes of passed management they shall fucceed in the present. Whoever does not intuitively distinguish right from wrong in the conduct of great affairs, can never be fuccessful by judging from parallelarity; because, as in these two instances, tho' ships, seas, and the directing their flations, may be the whole concern in each, yet the similarity in these objects create no reason, either to avoid mistakes or pursue the advantages of a prior destination, where there is no resemblance of circumstances in the undertaking; and no two can be sufficiently similar, or sufficiently unlike, to justify a parallel or opposite conduct in any director of them.

The duke du Tallard, as I have been informed by a gentleman who thoroughly understands military affairs, made the same disposition at Elenbeim, that the great Gustavus Adolphus had done at the samous battle which he won against Valstein; yet the French general was deseated, and the English triumphed. No circumstances can be sufficiently alike to justify similar proceedings in men who are to direct. Imitators want force of understanding to penetrate, pursue, and put in action that which the original contrivers had conceived in various ways in laying down their plan. They are mimics of what was done, without comprehending the whole force of what might have been done: wherefore, in the progress of an action planned in imitation of another, when the circumstances vary from the former, not seeing the reason of the defign, they are unequal to the supplying what the original contriver would easily have afforded: knowing no more than the historian has delivered, they follow fervilely like copyists, and are defeated. Had this marine m-r, in his destinations of these naval expeditions, judged from original lights and principles, he must certainly have imagined, that du Guay would have avoided the beaten tract in times of peace; he would therefore have divided Mr Hawke's squadron into two equal parts, which making nine in each foundron, would have been still three to two; a proper and superior force wherewith to oppose monsieur du Guay; these, attended with smaller ships to have been used as scouts, by cruizing off cape Finisterre, and in the other station thro' which the French squadron passed, there being but these two ways of steering their courses, without great ill luck, at least without blame to the planner of the cruize, must have intercepted the French fleet in its coming to Brest, and brought their ships into English harbours.

This however not being done, proves that the flying from error on one side, drives weak minds into an equal mistake in the opposite extreme, as young spendthrifts frequently become old misers.

Nor is it in matters of great moment only this infufficiency of conduct appears: the floop which carried the field-equipage belonging to the officers of Octoby's regiment from London to Plymouth, because the transports were failed before the arrived at that port, was obliged to wait for orders to follow them.

The transports which the m-r had cunningly sens to bring the Dutch troops over, before he knew they would come, like a booby who feeks a midwife before his wife is with child, after their fruitless and expensive stay in Holland, sailed for the Hessians, when it was first discovered that no orders from the ad---- had been transmitted to justify the taking these troops on board. This neglect created this expensive delay, 'till a letter could come from and return to that part of Europe; nay, even the H---ns, fo very dear to this nation, were permitted to fail hither without convoy, so that two twenty gun ships of France, might have carried them all into Dunkirk with great facility.

The superintendency of our islands in America, is not one iota less remarkably provident. Monsieur D'Aubigny is too strong for our fleet at Antigua and the Leeward islands, and monsieur Perrier de Salvert is in the same situation with respect to our fleet at Jamaica, notwithstanding that admiral Townshend, with his whole fleet of one ship, is safely arrived at that island.

In like manner, as the very ultimate of all found judgment had been displayed in the distribution of the cannon, carriages, powder, and ball, separately on board the transports for America; so another exhibition of equal good sense appears in sending out the four commanders to the Mediterranean; for as by the sagacity of dividing the stores, the chance of defeating the design was increased as four to one; so by confining all these four commanding officers to one ship, and not sending them separately, the chance is increased in the same proportion, that the whole design of their voyage may be frustrated also. War has been already declared two months, and no ship is yet sent to give notice of it in the East Indies.

The judgments of our m-rs, like pendulums, being eternally vibrating from one extreme to another, passing through, yet not resting in the mean, what hopes can ye entertain of reinstating the happy situation from which ye are fallen? That which should have been blended they have divided, and that which should have been separated they have united: and through the whole have proved themselves the very antipodes to common Sense. Few men have been born with talents and abilities vastly superior to the rest of mankind, yet many have been well adapted to the knowledge and conduct of little things, who have been incapable of comprehending the effect and beauty of what is great and sublime; like the fly which admired the polish of a mirror, and condemned the architecture of St. Pauls. The merest fribble of a virtuolo, insensible to the great order of nature, can trace with delight and skill the various and minute shapes, shades, and colours, in a shell or flower, which distinguish one from another, but there appears in the ad-nof the pretent m-r in maritime affairs, an equal incapacity for the conduct of great and little matters; the same head which has so egregiously erred in the destination and appointment of larger fleets, has in like manner been infufficient to the minutest duty of his office; one instance of the former, more conspicuously flagrant than the rest, now comes to be laid before you.

Since the beginning of last January, every news-paper has been replete with the great military preparations which were making at Toulon, the number of ships equipping, and soldiers marching towards that port, Marfeilles, and places adjacent. The object for which these forces were destined was as constantly mentioned: this subject was the common conversation of all ranks of men, from the artisan to the peer; and all except the m——-rs believed that Minorca would speedily be attacked.

If the nature of this military preparation would have permitted a concealment of it, much might have been faid in vindication of the m——rs who gave no credit to the account; but fince thousands saw and declared it to all the nations upon earth, why were the m——rs dif-

fident of, or unacquainted with it? an instance unexampled in any ad_____ n but their own. The number of Macnamara's fleet had before been equally unknown or disbelieved; this then is the second instance of fatal ignorance, defective intelligence, or arrogant disbelief of the force of our enemies.

By whatever arguments the m-rs might be seduced to discredit this military preparation at Toulon, the very probability of Minorca's being attacked, and the esfential importance which it is of to the B——— h commerce, ought to have created a jealousy in them, that the French would not long overlook so important an object, unattended to, and neglected as it was, by them. These considerations alone, without giving credit to what was transacting at Toulon, made it their duty indispensibly to have placed Minorca in security from all French invasion.

Besides these reasons, there was yet another motive to the strengthening that island from hostilities, and to the believing it threatened with an invasion, the repeated requests for succours from the brave commander of the castle of St. Philip. This gallant man, after reiterated letters to them -rs, at length wrote to this purpose to his nearest relation; "I have often requested succours from the m-r, I have been as often promifed to receive them, and as constantly disappointed in the promife; this then will, I imagine, terminate " in my falling a facrifice to their neglect; however, " though it should shorten my days a year or two, it will the sooner put you in possession of what I shall e leave you, and in which I wish you happy."

Notwithstanding the consequence of that island to this kingdom, what had been published by the public, written by the governor, and believed by all mankind, no attention was paid to the protection of it. No land forces fent, though the number within the fortress was known to be unequal to the duty and defence of it against a siege; and whereas in the year 1744 admiral Matthews, with a fleet of 48 sail, 9 of which were three decked ships, was employed in the Mediterranean; now commodore Edgecombe with 3 Ships and 2 frigates only, was thought a sufficient protection for the Mediterranean trade, and island of Minorca.

Whatever were the reasons, no attention was paid to this important possession? Whilst all Europe beheld this neglect with amazement, and every true English heart trembled for the wound which he faw must be inflicted on his country, our m——rs were honourably engaged in laying wagers there was no fleet nor failors to man a fleet at Toulon; that if there should be any it was not defigned against Misson; and treating with derision the apprehensions of all who foresaw the event, and whose love for their country would not permit them to be at ease; whilst the honour of the crown, and the interest of the kingdom, were open to infult and diminution, by this finister neglect, and the French attacking Minorca.

During this time our royal navy, full manned and prepared for the feas, was riding triumphantly at Spithead, and the head of the ad-y paid as an ad-l, abient on leave, at the rate of a thousand a year, as if all that had been done in honours and profits had been hitherto inadequate to his merit. Glorious picture of wisdom in your m-rs! illustrious ancedote of their prudent ad-n, for their fons to read hereafter, and curse their fires! but happily providence, in commiseration to this people, has denied that bleffing to the most confpicuous of them, kindly refusing to their wishes that progeny, which, treading in their fathers footsteps, must still be baneful to this isle.

At length, after four months passed in m--l inattention, and in wonder by gazing multitudes, Mr Byng fet sail on the 5th of April from Spithead, with ten ships of the line for the Mediterranean.

During these months of inattention and neglect, La Galissoniere, with twelve ships of the line and five frigates, with transports sufficient to carry 15,000 men, animunition, and artillery for a siege, commanded by the Duc de Richelieu, were gotten ready, and sailed from Toulon; and on the 18th of April landed in the island of Mmorca, eight days after our fleet weighed anchor from Spithead, and almost six weeks before they arrived near Mahon.

Mahon. The confirmation of the French descent on Minerca was the first intelligence which demonstrated the truth of what all men believed except the m-rs, and of what they had neglected in not sending succours to Mahon.

Pernicious as this delay of fending fuccours now appeared to every eye, it was not yet irremediable, tho' the troops were debarked, the citadel was not yet taken, and the avowed bravery of the commander justified the belief, that no shameful surrender of the fortress would stain the last moments of his life. Notwithstanding which, it was confidently afferted by the m-rs and their hireling spouters, that La Gallissoniere's fleet consisted only of eight ships of the line, and that Mr Byng would blow them out of the water.

Here was an opportunity to be envied of retrieving all the reputation which had been forfeited by the first neglect, in not sending a sufficient force to oppose the enemy's descent on Minorca.

Men of genius, though hitherto deluded or mislaken, would have improved this overlight into an advantage, and by reinforcing the squadron under Mr B --- g, with a number of ships equal to that with which he set sail, would have defeated the French fleet and starved their troops in Minorca. By preventing military stores, they would have faved St. Philip's, and by preventing the arrival of provision, have obliged the whole army to have furrendered prisoners of war. How capable then was the first negle & of being converted to the glory of the king and kingdom? but, alas! they knew not the strength of that very citadel, which was to be befieged; and the moment they received the intelligence of the French being landed, desponding, they concluded it was taken; otherways the first inattention might have been metamorphofed from incapacity to wisdom, from disgrace to honour, from loss to advantage, from censure to applause. All the states of Europe would have believed the first behaviour, as designed to obtain the fecond advantage; and, converting an egregious imbecility into a refined stratagem, conceived highly of that policy, which is now univerfally despised and exploded. But, alas! the same saturnine planet rules our m-rs alike arbitrarily, at all hours and on all occasions; their genius tending eternally to the center, like a flone thrown into a cavern tells you by every stroke, that it finks nearer to the abysis of waters, in which it flounces at last and is no more heard of.

The error which had been committed in not fending fuccours at first, improved by sending an insufficient force under Mr Byng, was still continued by neglecting to fend a reinforcement, which would probably have joined him before he reached Gibreltar; at least a ship might have carried intelligence to Corunna; and as the winds were adverse for the squadron, a courier would have reached Gibraltar before the fleet, and detained it till he was joined by a further force.

Notwithstanding this, Mr Byng was fuffered to proceed with ten ships of the line, and the chance of meeting Mr Edgecombe, 13 in all against 12 French sail of equal force to relieve Minorca; whilst Mr Osburn, with 15 sail of the line, remained at Spithead, and 10 in the harbour of Portsmouth.

At length, after long delays from adverse winds, Mr B-g arrives on the 20th of May within fight of Minorca and the enemy's fleet. Imagine then, what must be the joy which fired the eart of the old gallant Blakeney at the fight of the B——  $\beta$  fleet: warmed with all the spirit of a true subject, he now cherished the fond hopes of obtaining glory to himself, honour to his master, and interest to his country, by this succour which he saw, in defeating the enemy's fleet, and rendering all the French schemes abortive; such, probably, was the pleasing entertainment of his mind, when the B-- h flag appeared in fight.

Bur, alas! Mr B—g, after having attacked the French squadron, with not a man killed or wounded on board his own and many other ships; with but 48 killed, and 168 wounded in the whole fquadron, retires unattempting to relieve the garrison of Mahon, because the Intrepid had her fore top-mast shot away, and leaves

(46) the brave general and his companions cooped within the garrison of St. Philip's, quite destitute of all hopes of re-

Judge then, what was the horror of this brave man's mind, when he first knew the behaviour of our fleet, and faw all his expectations of relief and honour reduced to air; deserted in this manner by the  $B - \int b$  navy, he was yet sustained by himself; his heart felt the behaviour of Mr B—g with more anguish than the necessity of being obliged to capitulate; he defended the citadel to the last, and then gave it up reluctantly to your enemies. If you have yet the faculties of human nature, weep over the severe fate of that brave man, and the sacrifice of your neglected fellow-countrymen! Pay that tribute to the remembrance of their bravery, though ye are denied arms to revenge their loss; then call to mind by whose conduct they have perished.

Refolve me then, those who daily suck the vital blood of E-d, and vociferate in defence of m-l conduct, whence did it fpring, that the number of the enemy's fleet, which in the beginning was known to all, was still unknown to the m-rs? Why a superior force was not fent to destroy them? And why, when French forces. were landed at Minorca, and the number of the squadron acknowledged to be twelve, that a reinforcement was not immediately fent after Mr. Byng, yet to frustrate the French attempts, destroy the fleet, and starve or take prisoners marshal Richelieu and his whole army? Tell me, ye who are hired or share in the spoiling your country for such purposes; tell me, - or is this behaviour so heinous, that even ye are dumb, and ashamed to vindicate your m — 1 masters?

How then are those opposite manners of m-l proceeding, with respect to Germany and Minorca, reconcileable with the interest of G - t B - n, and the duty of a B - f b m - r; why was H - r fortified and secured by treaties with Russians, Prussians, Hessians, and Holsteiners, purchased by profusion of E——sh treasure? H——r, which has already proved so satal in exhausting the riches of E-d; and Minorca, though not the fource of your wealth, the protection of it when drawn from other fountains, totally difregarded? what reason can be assigned for this inverted behaviour, but that having lavished millions in consequence of those treaties, and the safeguard of German dominions, there remained not supplies sufficient to protect Minorca: this, tho' the most profligate, would have been some excuse; but these men are yet more unnatural and abandoned; they have fattened a spurious race with your heritage, and starved their legitimate offspring; whilst (from authority it is pronounced) your annual p—y supplies were vigorous and effectual.

Have they then thus difrespectfully treated you, that the fources of your wealth from commerce, being diminished by the loss of Mahon, your declining state may fooner introduce poverty, with dejection her companion, and adapt your fouls to the wearing, with tranquillity, those chains which the m——I posspolite is forging for you? or, that your protection being destroyed against the Barbary corfairs, your honest sailors may fall a prey to that remorfeless crew, and, learning there, teach at their return, that being yet one degree above the slaves of Barbary, you have not equal right to deplore your fate,

Fatal as this may prove to this once happy country, culpable as the ad——I may appear in the eyes of all Europe, difgraceful as it is to the B——fb arms, and difhonourable to the crown of these realms, are not those who delayed the succours at first, those who left that negle& unremedied, by sending an insufficient force, and even providing against that second error by a reinforcement, yet infinitely more the objects of your resentment? speaking like men, not blinded with the reigning maladies of arrogance and self-sufficiency, but from the experience of former times, what expectations could be reasonably entertained, that ten E—fb ships of inferior force, or even when joined by Mr Edgecombe's squadron, that equal powers would have had a more than equal chance of victory; or that the event would prove less favourable to the enemy than the English. Such imaginations ginations in favour of their countrymen may be laudable, and of service in the common sailor and common soldier. but in the man who is to appoint fleets and commanders,

Let it be imagined, however, that the B - /b fleet, with this equality of force, could have conquered the French; was it reasonable to believe the victory would have been so cheaply purchased, and our ships so little damaged by the engagement, as to keep the seas and relieve Minorca? as it probably would not, and as both fleets were equally excluded from the harbour of Mabon, would not a conquest over the French squadron have been even then attended with the loss of the citadel and island? To what realm could the E-fb fleet have steered to find materials to repair the injuries of the battle? Would Spain have supplied them with naval stores, and indulged them to refit in Carthagena? No man the least acquainted with the present dispositions of that court believes they would; probably then, considering the present state of Lisbon, Plymouth is the first hospitable harbour that could have afforded them assistance.

If a victory then, of such a nature as the above, would have prevented the fleet of E-d from keeping the feas and fuccouring Minorca, how much less likely is it, that effectual relief would have been the consequence of a drawn battle, or a defeat on our side? Does it not appear then too evident, that no success, which good sense has a right to expect with fuch parity of force, could have relieved the citadel of St. Philip, or justified the m-rs in fending out so small a squadron for the defence of so important an object?

Whatever then may prove the event of this engagement to the admiral, let not the depravity of his behaviour seduce your attention from those who sent him so unequal to the undertaking. If after a candid and deliberate examination, it shall appear, that he has been egregiously remiss in his duty to his king and country at the hour of battle; consider how much more those are delinquent, who delayed the expedition and fent him at last with insufficient force. There are men, when superior to their enemies, who wear the outlide of gallantry and succeed, who perhaps, when on equal terms, from confelling some inward tentations of danger, may retire and milcarry; if it was his dury to have ritined every thing in prefervation of Maker, was it less obligatory on them, by a superior sheer, to have prevented all probable prefumption of mitcaringe? After all, if Mr B-g's fpirit proved in the experiment inferior to that of the enemy, was not the armament which the m- gave him to command, inferior to that of the Francialing on what account was the B--/h fleet obliged to rifgue the loss of victory and Minores. by engaging on equal Terms, when by being double that number, it might have preferved the island, and triumphed over your adversaries? Whence does it arise then, that if the marine m -- r is by nature and capacity adapted to the duty or his high effice, that a man to obviously unequal to the task was letected to command the fleet of E - d, and a fleet to inferior to the duty fent to protect Mahon?

Whatever delinquency may then be imagined to have been committed on this account, are not the man restill more criminal? The bravelt man on earth, by exerting every superior faculty of the human mind, destined and appointed to command a fleet of that for e, might only more conspicuously have manifested the installment of the man provision and judgment, in the conducting this affair; and proved, that though victorials had have crowned his arms, that the shattered condition of his ships would have rendered it impossible to preserve Maken; whereas the man restand it in their power, by augmenting the force of the fleet, not only to have preserved difference, but to have commanded success, sayed Minorca, deseated their enemies, and crowned themselves, the adalahed, their king and country with immortal homeon.

Yet if you ask why more ships were not dispatched to the succour of Minerca, they answer, no mere were manned ready for the seas. Was it then through want of power or pecuniary supplies, that this deficiency arose? not from the first, because that they exert in a more despotic manner than is known in the most arbitrary states of Europe, in impressing seamen; not from the second, because no opposition in p-t has delayed one moment the levying what money the m -r pleased: if to this they shall add, that the kingdom cannot furnish failors to mann the fleet with more expedition, and that a large number of men of war are necessary for channel fervice, and to prevent invalions on this island, and therefore a greater force could not be fent to the Mediterranean; ask how it was done the last war? and why, in the p-t of 1755, when all this that has followed, and much more was apprehended, a militia bill was neglefted to be passed? this would have permitted the m-r to have destined your fleet to useful enterprizes, and cleared Spithead from flying pendants, and the useless parade of a large navy without application or advantage. This would have faved you millions of money, and fecured your shores from every hostile attack, more effectually than all the ships built since the ark, or Argo which set sail with admiral Jason to setch the golden fleece from Colchos.

If then the fouls of our m-rs are in unifon with their country's good, why did they delay and reject this necessary duty to their king and their fellow tubjects? ... Let then the word militia be eternally halloo'd in their ears; may their imaginations awake, and sleeping be haunted with this terrifying neglect; may this idea be ever present to their minds, the ghost of that blessing which they strangled, 'till, alarmed by dread, and guilt, they repent and arm this defenceless land.

The what region is now fled all that panegyric, which two side ideally founded through the kingdom, of dispatch, dibgence, and capacity, in the m-e m-r? Why were those ships so expeditiously equipt, so ineffectually defined and applied? What injury has this hurry and expence brought on your enemies, or what advantage to this nation, unless the private gains of a few thoufands, and the infamous appellation of thieves and pyrates from your enemies, unanswered by your m-rs, are conceived an adequate recompence for the national expence of millions, and the loss of character through all the realms of Europe. The

The baseless fabric of his temple of same then is vanished; the deserted proprietor of that short lived glare of reputation is now funk into rayless obcurity, like the bliss of some poor cottager, who from his dream of millions wakes amidst the pangs of penury; happy for this isle, could the fatal effects of his male administration vanish with the unmerited reputation of the author.

Egregiously delinquent as the m-rs have proved themselves in this neglect of Minorca, with what accumulated guilt ought they to be viewed, when the recapitulation of their whole conduct comes to be confidered by you.

If those who have lost Mahon, and permitted your gallant countrymen in hopeless defence to fall the guiltless sacrifices of their neglect, the unavailing yet august victims of their own and country's honour, objects worthy of your admiration and affliction, the eternal stigma of an unnatural ad --- n, have ruined your trade in the Mediterranean, subjected your sailors to the captures and flavery of Barbary pirates, by this one misconduct, what will be the whole event of the aggregate of their imbecillity, when by wrong choice of commanders in America, and inattention to that valuable part of E-B possessions, many provinces are left open to hostile inroad, May not the French, who have been some time sending troops to the Mfffppi, this fummer become masters of Georgia and Cerolina, so defenceless and open; or perhaps fome province more lucrative and better adapted to the necessities of Fcance.

What have you to expect from your boafted naval bulwark, if the same men continue to direct it, who have already lavished in ineffectual destination and insufficient force so many millions? Have the French expeditions been rendered abortive in one instance? Have the captures of their ships of war exceeded three, equal to our loss only?

In like manner, behold what have been the fatal consequences of their transactions in Europe; treaties, ruinous to the welfare of that flate; defertion of old allies and more potent friendships, for connections with weaker and more needy powers; profution of public money to hireling mercenaries, national degradation and contempt in foreign eyes, imputation of diffoyalty or cowardice on yourselves, while you are denied the use of arms to defend yourlelves, your wives, and daughters from open enemies, and the facrilegious hands of venal foreigners, nurtured by your own money, brought on pretended terms of hospitality, if they should dare to treat you with infolence.

In the mean time, your fellow-subjects, seduced into the army by promises of being listed for three years, and to defend their country only, are kidnapped, and forced on board ship by compulsion, treated and transported like flaves, God knows where; to return, God knows when *.

Is it not possible then, that by cominging to increase the number of infolent foreigners, and fending out the native troops, that at length a flanding army of the former may become too formidable to be opposed by the people of G - t B - g, difarmed as ye are? Or even by the military thus daily decreasing by transportation to diffant parts of the world, if at length they should refent the want of confidence which is manifested by thus that loyal body of men.

Who then can wonder, if from one continued feries of mistakes, and flagrant manifestations of m - lineapacity, the Swedes should shatch this golden opportunity of repossessing Bremen and Verden, the Austrians Silefia, the Spaniards Gibrahar, and the French, after having

Have not the treaty with Prussia, and desertion of Austrian interest, laid a probable foundation for the Swedes and Germans to accomplish the two former? Will not the fuffering Mahon to be taken, and yielding up that harbour to the French, encourage the Spaniard to attempt the third? and France having no farther object for her fleet in the Mediterranean, unite and employ all her force in perpetrating the fourth?

Will then the actual possession of some, and nearer prospect of subduing all these places, permit the m -- I gang to raife the supplies for the ensuing year? Will those who have assisted the m-y, through the lucrative view of private interest, lend them their money when the danger of losing all exceeds the possibility of the profit? Then will it not too evidently appear, when bankruptcy, diffress, and anarchy are let loose, that the unlimited profusion of E-B gold for German interest has at length brought that inundation of evils, fo long predicted, on this deplorable country?

Who then are friends, and who your foes? What are those men who dare to impure disk yalty to subjects, whose words and actions would have contributed to fave this finking state, if their counsel had been followed? shall the tracing a Scotch renegado jesuit through all his doubling lies and fallacies, to prevent future imposition on a few, by the discovery, be (as it ought) deemed a laudable and honest pursuit; and yet the unravelling the mitchiefs which m-rs have brought on a whole natition, and attempting to refeue it from their impious hands, be blafted with the appellation of a libel? Be not, like individual atoms playing in the fun beams, detached from one another, whirl'd to and fro, as the breath of m——I conduct blows amongst ye. Let the general good, like the general attraction, hold ye firm to what we are vourfelves and country; otherwise, to what purpole do ye curse the a-- I that for sook the cause of king and country, and praise the gallant Blakeney who never never deserted his trust? Why do ye importunately ask, will the Spenierds join the French to attack Gibraltar? Will the French invade this kingdom? Alas! neither imprecation nor panegyric, the taking or desence of Gibraltar, or even the coming of the French, can bring a greater though a more sudden evil on your condition. Nothing can long relieve or save this nation: if the same rulers in the cabinet continue to preside, ye need no foreign enemy to make ye slaves. Can ye conceive that the same men who have brought ruin on your affairs, have either inclination or abilities to reinstate them in their former happy situation? inquisitive but senseless of your fate, your souls seem to have lost all those virtuous and quick sensations, which have hitherto been the inseparable companions of a free state.

To what purpose then, when all remedies must come too late, will this predicted ruin be believed by you? What will then avail that anguish, when you curse your destroyers and your own inattention? perhaps accompanied with this imbittering reflexion, that those whom ye assisted to ruin you have bound your hands in chains, and are become the arbitrary masters of the kingdom. Unless then ye suddenly awake from this trance into which ye are fallen, your foreign or demestic enemies will prevent ye, and then ye must sleep the sleep of death, Eng-

However destructive therefore this action of Mr B-g may appear on enquiry, remember, before it be too late, once more I charge you to examine whether the original authors of that evil are not infinitely more criminal? If it shall be found, that his conduct has in one instance entailed disgrace on this kingdom, let it be seen whether the m-rs have not, by numberless and repeated acts, almost overwhelmed the land with infamy; nay though he should be condemned for want of courage, will it not be just to enquire whether, if those men have, with unwearied diligence, depreciated every virtue, and sapped every honourable motive of the human foul, given power and honours to riches only, and neglected all degrees degrees of merit; this very imputation of want of refolution may not equitably be ascribed to them also?

Is it then a wonder, that men in all ranks, corrupted in head and heart, should be unequal to the tasks which honour only can inspire, and virtue accomplish? Remember then, if Mr B-g be doomed to punishment, to which it is not improbable he may, as a scape-goar . offered to your resentment for the salvation of the m-rs, that this can avail nothing in your favour. Will not the same deficiency of judgment still operate in the choice of commanders and deffination of expeditions, whill the direction remains in the fame hand? What expectation have ye by his removal, that your national affairs will wear a better face, or raite the fallen condition of this finking Iand?

Will it not then be strictly equitable, that the same voice which calls Mr B-g to a candid examination of his conduct, should summon also those who have so long and so fatally superintended the direction of national affairs to an impartial enquiry, that ye be ascertained why the territories of England on the Obio were shamefully conceded to the French; to whom, and to what purposes, your millions have been lavished, whether to the ruin or advantage of this island; on what account Mabon and America were neglected, and H-r preferred to all; and from what cause it happens, that fix millions and a half in the last year of queen dinne's reign, could suffice for the interest of fifty millions, and the support of a vigorous war; that now twelve millions, when the annual expence of the debt, by the diminished interest of money, exceeds not what it was at that time, are not equal to the annual extravagance of the m-rs, or productive of one victory?

In her reign, though your treasures were exhausted, and your fellow-subjects slaughtered for German interests, ye sustained the flattering character of a brave and honest people amongst the nations, and were, by the superb victories which your general obtained, honoured and revered; but under the direction of these inauspicious m-rs, ye live without renown, and die without victory,

victory, stigmatized with the infamous brand of thieves and pyrates, by that nation which then dared not to look ye in the face: Shameful alternative!

Notwithstanding this, if before a just tribunal the transactions of the m____rs fhali be found both honourable and upright, and the approaching fate of Bowing to these irresistable causes, by which all nations perish, and to which they are not accessary, they will then like fouls passed through Purgatory to Paradise, rise from calumny to approbation, from hatred to esteem, from pain to pleafure. What then can be more acceptable to men of integrity, than such an enquiry? But if through the evidence of truth, they shall stand convicted of male-administration, let no malevolence presume to draw comparisons between the conduct of passed m-rs who have fuffered, and the present who have not, or attempt increasing the heinousness of their actions, by truly itating those of the sufferers: for the sake of these who are yet alive, I wish you never to recal the decapitation of lord Strasford, or compare his and their conduct-Revenge is criminal, it is unworthy a Briton; if the love of your country must make ye feel the passions to which human nature is subjected, remember, though ye are men, that ye are Christians also; and, notwithstanding the ruin of this land is well nigh completed, implore your I n to afford those enemies to his realm that mercy which they have ever denied his innocent people; and when he shall graciously preserve them from condign punishment, that he will mercifully cast an eye of pity also on millions of his faithful fubjects, and fave them from perdition, by at once removing from his presence, the spoilers of the dignity of his crown, and liberties of his subjects; keep then your eyes and attention steadily on your prince, from him expect relief; there remains yet one method by which ye may all be faved.
